After Losing Art in Los Angeles Fires, CSUF Artists Have a New Vision

Cal State Fullerton faculty member Mary Anna Pomonis and student Mia Aghili both lost their artwork to the Eaton Fire, California's second most destructive wildfire.

Pomonis' exhibition, "Quiver," opened Jan. 5 at the Alto Beta Gallery in Altadena. Two days later, the entire body of artwork was engulfed in flames.

Aghili lost her home and all of her art to date. Upon returning to campus, CSUF's College of the Arts provided art supplies to help her rebuild. "In the chaos, all I wanted to do was create," Aghili explained.

Grief quickly turned to motivation for the pair, who are now leaning into their art.

"You're here to tell the story of what it is to be human in this time," Pomonis shares with her students. "And there's nothing more human than loss.

CSUF Urges Congress to Protect Critical Funding for Students

Cal State Fullerton President Ronald Rochon and a university delegation traveled to Washington, D.C., in April to advocate for CSUF's top federal priorities. This effort was part of an annual California State University advocacy week in the nation's capital.

"We simply cannot afford federal cuts to higher education — not when the stakes are this high. Every dollar invested in our students pays dividends in a stronger economy, a more skilled workforce, and a more just and equitable society," said Rochon.
